Children develop and grow up with many different influences. But it seems birth order is very important in shaping a child's personality. Whether birth order really has a strong effect on one's psychological development is a theory often challenged by researchers, and yet there has been plenty of concrete evidence to prove it.

The first born child gets a great deal of attention from both parents. Because the parents have no parenting experience, there is a tendency for them to try too hard in raising the child. While the mother may lavish attention on the first born, the father may be too strict. The result: a child that tends to be a perfectionist, somewhat pessimistic and possibly a loner.

Now that the parents have experience in raising the firstborn, they have a tendency to relax the rules for the middle child. As a result, the middle child tends to be more outgoing and more sociable than their older sibling.

By the time the last born arrives, the parents have really loosened the reins when it comes to discipline. Often the last born receives a lot of attention from their older siblings and less attention from the parents. Later in life the last born may be honest and charming while having a moody side.

It is important to remember that the relationship between siblings as they grow up may also be a factor in the child's development. And the difference in ages can be another factor. If there is a several-year difference between siblings, the outcomes can be vastly different.
